The BMW M coupe always had a lot to live up to. Conceived by five engineers working overtime and undercover, it set out to be a no-holds-barred return to the enthusiast-focused philosophy upon which BMW once built its reputation.

Back in 1998 this was the car for those who found the M3 too soft, too understated, and the M roadster too fragile. Still beloved by many of M's senior engineers today, there is no getting away from the fact this particular masterpiece from Munich is a pedigree Rottweiler – not one cross-bred with a poodle.

With monster tyres and oversized arches, the styling was far from discreet. The concept was all about fusing the relatively conventional sportscar design of the standard Z3, with a heavy dose of outright aggression and the added torsional strength that only a tin top coupe provides. This was a return to proper old-school sports cars that demanded the driver's full attention.

This early S50 powered example has covered only 44,000 miles and features a full-service history from new. The workshop has carried out the usual thorough inspection and gave the green light confirming this car meets the very strict criteria set for all our sales cars.
